

Consult 4 Kids publishes “Best Practices” each month to share what we’ve learned about high-quality, youth-centered programs.

Learning through the multiple intelligences helps everyone be a “round peg in a round hole”.

It is important to get student input.

Look at your program through a lens of safety-put the lens on when you arrive at work and take a look first at the physical environment and then at the practices you have in place to promote emotional safety.

Remember to look through your own lens and to the best of your ability the lens of the youth and staff in your program.

Make time to build a relationship with each student assigned to your cluster every day during Opening.
